CITY OF NEWPORT

Evening, Caledonian Well Received
Recent Deaths—Real Estate
Sales—A Gasoleneless Sunday—News of the City

At the close of the first month, as reporter for the Evening Caledonian we review the result of our effort to give Newport people the city's news. We have reason to feel pleased with our efforts. This is entirely new work for your reporter and he asks the people as well as the editor to overlook our mistakes, but all errors that have appeared have not been the reporter's fault, but believing in boosters rather than knockers we have refrained from calling the office force any pet names. We appreciate the way our people have received us when we have been nosing around trying to find out what is taking place in our city, also for the way people have handed in news. We want everyone to feel free to telephone or hand in to our office any news that they may know, as it requires a lot of news to supply a daily paper.

The 24 days that we have been reporter and handled the paper for Newport we have sold over 1800 copies, and believe in the near future we shall be able to handle 200 copies a day. We are receiving many orders to be delivered each day. The price for this service is 50 cents a month. The paper arrives on the Air Line and failed only once last month, when they came on the mail train. Not a customer failed to have his paper delivered during the month. We give our paper boy credit for this. We have received some classified advertisements and are looking for many more later.

Love Letters in Hymn Book.

A pair of lovers who had been forbidden to speak or write, attended the same church, and their plan was the exchange of hymn books. As the young man was an officer of the church he did this little job before service. Most delightful and satisfactory love letters could be pieced together by following certain lead-pencil marks, and in order to elude even a Sherlock Holmes of the household, the letters were made to read from the end to the beginning of the book.

Her Mistake

By MILDRED WHITE

(Copyright, 1918, Western Newspaper Union.)

Dulcie sat apart and looked tearfully across the moonlit bay. Her heart was not in this impromptu merrymaking.

A friend had called her up just as the sun went down, begging that she would persuade her brother Bob to drive her over to the park for a picnic lunch, with a moonlight sail on the lake to follow. Bob had been eagerly agreeable, and soon after their big car was safely parked near the monument Dulcie lost her brother's companionship, as he immediately attached himself to one of the girls.

Dulcie was glad that the laughing departure of the party for the lake ride left her in retrospective solitude. Walking headward in little separate groups, they had not noticed her absence. All day long the girl had longed to be alone to think things out, to fight down the great barrier of pride which had caused her such useless misery.

Ronnie was going to war. That was the uppermost thought. Tomorrow he would be on his way to camp.

Of course it had not been Ronnie's fault that the two were obliged to play in the same club orchestra; they had merely been selected as the most skillful players. That the girl musician should be unusually attractive was not Ronnie's fault either; but in the evening darkness of the park with the tears still upon her cheeks, Dulcie's chin tilted defiantly; there was no reason why Ronnie should have devoted all his spare hours to practice. Dulcie's presence being unnecessary at these club rehearsals, she awaited her lover's return upon her own veranda; and her grievance grew. Had Ronnie not been hers to command, since the time he had carried her books from school? What right had a blonde violin girl to usurp that which was hers? Of course Dulcie would not deign to put this in so many words. Her attitude alone spoke her displeasure.

It was, therefore, a perplexed young man who, after one of these "waiting" evenings upon the veranda, was dismissed with coolness at an early hour. The final break came upon that night, when he, all unsuspecting of tragedy, walked to those same veranda steps with the violin girl at his side. The girl, as he raised his hat in departure, had smilingly asked him "to come around to the house" for a moment, and she would give him that music."

Ronnie had gone; when he came back to Dulcie's veranda Dulcie had disappeared. It had taken some ingenuity upon her part to avoid him since that fateful time, but Dulcie had persisted. Twice, upon Ronald's accepted calling evening, her mother after a puzzled search of the house for her daughter, had been obliged to tell him that she was not at home.

Receiving no explanation or apology for his sweetheart's absence, Ronald remained away, while the rehearsals continued. As weeks passed they met occasionally upon the street. After one swift, questioning glance in the direction of Dulcie, apparently unconscious of his presence, the young man had squared his shoulders and passed on, a hurt look in the clear eyes. But now, like some great hand brushing aside the petty jealousy and heart-burnings of the past, came news of Ronald's going to war.

"Oh! he would be brave!" She choked a little at the thought. Could she let him go with no kind, encouraging word?

Dulcie sat up and looked at her wrist watch; already the choice was out of her hands. When Bob came for her it would be too late for hope of finding Ronnie. Early in the morning the troop train was leaving. Hopelessly she arose and made her way to Monument square, where the auto was parked. She had no wish to meet her friends again this night.

Like a tired child Dulcie crept into the back empty seat, drawing the dark robe over her body. Grief is wearying. With a loud, quivering sigh she closed her eyes and slept. Half drowsily she realized that her brother had slipped into the front seat, evidently having seen her sleeping; easily the car swung about and rolled down the broad avenue. Silently Dulcie lay and blinked at the stars. At last she spoke:

"Oh, Bob," murmured her saddened voice, "do you think it would be too late to go and find Ronnie? Of course it would be," she added hastily, "but"—her voice broke—"I do so want to bid him good-by."

For a moment there was no reply; then the car came to an abrupt standstill, while the driver stepped quickly over to the rear seat.

"Dulcie, as I'm alive," cried a dearly familiar voice, and Ronnie the soldier clasped his sweetheart in his arms. "I don't know how you got here," he went on joyously, "and I don't care, as long as the blessed fact remains." Afterward as they rode along together, Dulcie lifted her head from her lover's shoulder. "It was fate," she remarked positively, "your car being parked there beside ours, the same make and all. Even a girl in her responsible mind might have made the same mistake."

Ronnie did not answer. He raised his hand very tenderly and pressed Dulcie's head back against his shoulder.
